Comments

John Knowles, mariner, married Jemima Asten of Hampton and in 1666 he purchased a "dwelling house and house lot containing ten acres together with 6 acres of marsh," from Giles Fifield. The homestead was wholly or, in part, in possession of his descendants for seven generations. John Knowles was blind for the last ten years of his life. His great, great grandson, Deacon Jesse Knowles also lived in the homestead. After being blind for 8 years, he suddenly recovered his sight. The old Dutch Oven in this house is in especially fine condition. (From the 1938 Hampton Tricentennial book) Only barn remains from earlier house which burned in 1996.

Comments

This house was originally a small two room dwelling which, according to Cliff Pratt, may have been used to house workers on the Lamprey farm. An inspection of the building before demolition in 2001 revealed very old pegged timbers in the attic, leading us to the belief that this building had been on its site for nearly two centuries.

Note the old fashion construction. Pegs were used to hold the frame together. To the left of center, a light area reveals the plywood used to repair the roof. This is the left front corner of the house.

Pegs are clearly visible in the right front corner. Note the modern materials used to add a vent to the attic.

85 Locke Road

The house was built over a crawl space on a granite foundation.

The width of the floor boards was evident from the crawl space.

Comments

At one time Redman Shoe Company was located in a large building behind the house. House has undergone many renovations. In 2003 a large addition was made to rear of house. Part of original grant of Joseph Redman.

Assessors records date the house at 1900 while Dow indicates 1790s. Sherri Brown, whose in-laws lived in the house for many years, was certain that the house was much older than 1900 but has undergone many additions and renovations.

Comments

Georgian colonial adaptation, "front" entry at front & back of house. Addition off main house (late 1920s) to 18th C. carriage shed now used as living space. House started as small 2 story facing south like other homes on Locke Road. Later addition reoriented building to face street. House stayed in Redman family until early 1900s. Jonathan Redman married in 1819.
